

Dear Sir/Madam,

Thank you for contacting the University of Michigan Museum of Paleontology. We do not object to your uses. We may not be the copyright holder of the work; you may still need the permission from a copyright holder.

Your use may not require you to obtain permission from the copyright holder. In the US, some uses of copyrighted works are authorized by law.

For example, many articles and images in our older publications likely have entered the public domain (i.e. no longer restricted by copyright) and are free for everyone to use. The Cornell Public Domain Chart is very helpful in making public domain determinations. As you can see from the chart, when a work is published without copyright notice, or if the copyright was not renewed, the work would enter the public domain.

Even when a work is restricted by copyright, some educational uses are permitted by Copyright Act Section 107 “fair use.” You may wish to consult with our Library’s guide on fair use to decide whether your use is a fair use authorized by law.

If you determine that the work is not in the public domain and that your use is not fair, then a license granted by the copyright holder is likely necessary for your use.

The author or the author’s heirs are likely the copyright holder of the materials you wish to use. However, please note that the author sometimes does not hold copyright in certain elements in the published article; third parties may hold copyright in some images.

Sincerely,
UMMP
