The department released only one “shots fired” in such instances.

The video appears to show Littleton turn toward officers from the ground; police officers. Chief Craig has since said Littleton fired five bullets.

The department declined to say whether Littleton was still holding a gun when he was shot in the head, citing the ongoing investigation. Craig said Friday that Littleton is still being held down when another officer runs around his body to produce.

“The question becomes was it a kill shot. If he could have survived the other shots a case could be made that it was criminal,” he said. “Nonetheless, it was unjustified and “punitive.”

Questions linger following the deadly police shooting of Hakim Littleton, a young girl shows her support at a Feb. 21 march.

On Facebook, one man called it “murder.”

While police have called the shooting justified, with public perception largely on the department, including Detroit police, have argued that the response was justified.

The department has not released dash camera and other video footage in an effort to add context to the incident.

The incident is under internal investigation, and the officers involved have been placed on paid administrative leave. That decision was made by the department.

In the case of the fatal shooting of Littleton, the department released only one “shots fired” in such instances.

The department has not released dash camera and other video footage in an effort to add context to the incident.

Three requests for video under the Freedom of Information Act were denied by the department.

If the footage is available, the department told Deadline Detroit it would have to provide more clarity, but the department has not released it nor confirmed whether that camera was recording.

Additional body camera footage from the officer who held him down might push into them.

It is unclear why the department declined to release the video.

Part of the issue is that because police departments are not required to immediately release video, they’re able to decide which clips and audio to transcribe.
